

Lindsey Manshack

AREA BOARD CHAIR

Lindsey Manshack (Choctaw Apache) is a Public Health Research Coordinator at Washington University School of Medicine. She earned her MPH from Washington University's Brown School, working for and with Native students and organizations to increase behavioral health capacity in Indian Country.

She now works to strengthen community capacity to reduce health disparities by working with organizations, survivors, clinicians, researchers and advocates to enhance education and awareness about health and chronic disease risk, prevention and community resources. She works with organizations to help eliminate local and regional disparities in cancer education, prevention and treatment, including working with the Program for the Elimination of Cancer Disparities, the Kathryn M. Buder Center for American Indian Studies, Siteman Cancer Center, the Breakfast Club and the Show Me Healthy Women program.

Lindsey looks forward to serving on the Missouri Area Board to advance the Society's mission to save and celebrate lives and increase the health and wellness of all.
